University of Nebraska Involved In New Pilot Program

On June 20th, The University of Nebraska Lincoln was notified by the Nebraska Research Foundation that our university will be participating in a new program starting Fall of 2023 along with two other chosen institutions.

“Early Support” is an online four-year pilot program for remedial education intended to help prepare high school juniors and seniors who show great academic promise, for college. Therefore, our university will be working with a network of high schools in our region. Some of our very own professors will be in charge of teaching these online courses!

Although we don't know yet, our school will probably be focusing on computer skill development and English for this program; we will know more after a meeting that is taking place at the Capitol on August 15th.

Authors Note:

I did a lot of writing since my first draft and started by addressing the 5Ws and H. I took into consideration the nice and helpful feedback that my peers gave me as well. This project was a little more difficult than the previous one's because we have to sift through the hard-to-understand information and draft up a whole news release on something we don't exactly know about. With that being said, with a good amount of time I was able to come up with what I think is a successful news release.
